Pronunciation

Welsh has a largely phonetic writing system, that is, if you know how to spell it, you know how to say it (unlike English, see yacht). However, this isn't much help if you're unfamiliar with how each Welsh letter is pronounced. If you are familiar with IPA then refer to the appendix, otherwise read on for a very rough guide to Welsh pronunciation.

Stress

A stressed syllable is one that is emphasised more than the other syllables in a word or sentence. In the word English, the starting 'eng' is almost always stressed, say it aloud and you will understand. Sometimes the Indian accent will put the stress on 'glish' instead. Welsh has a stress system that is much more predictable than in English, where the stressed syllable is usually the second-to-last one in a multiple-syllable word:

ysgrif → ys grif
ysgrifen → ys gri fen
ysgrifennydd → ys gri fenn ydd

Table 1: Welsh stress pattern. The stress in most cases falls on the penultimate syllable of a polysyllabic word. It may be important to note that there are some prefixes that don't usually take stress, and some that take 'secondary stress', but listing all of the exceptions is not worth the effort. If a word is clearly a borrowing from English, it will usually keep the stress pattern it had in English, see ambulance/ambiwylans.

Consonants

Consonants in Welsh are mostly the same as in English, if not a bit more reliable. You will be familiar with the digraph th in English, well, in Welsh, digraphs are considered their own letters. The following are the important differences:

- C is always hard like a k, never soft like an s.
- Ch is said as in the Yiddish chutzpah.
- Dd is like the th in this, but not the th in thing. Say them both slowly: the difference is that th in thing voiceless, which means you do not use your vocal cords, and dd (or the th in this) is voiced, which means you vibrate your vocal cords as you do it.
- F is actually v, and ff is f.
- G is always hard.
- Ll is a more unique sound, to do this, set up your mouth as if you're going to say L, and blow air out.
- Ng is like the English thing, but can come at the start of words.

- Ngh as above, but with a bit of breath after, think Shanghai.
- R is trilled, which is another way of saying a ‘rolled r’.
- Rh as above, but with a bit of breath after.
- Si isn’t one of the digraphs counted in the main alphabet, but it makes the same noise as sh as in English.

Vowels

The usual joke is that Welsh words tend not to have any vowels (i.e. ystyby, meaning hospital), but the reasoning is that W and Y are both considered full vowels in Welsh. Vowels are either long or short, compare the English words boot and bottom. In unstressed syllables, the vowel is always short, and in stressed syllables the vowel may be long. If you’re trying to predict if the vowel in a stressed syllable is long, it isn’t perfect but the general rule of thumb is:

- it is the final syllable of a word, and the vowel is the final letter
- before plosives (these are consonants like b d g p t k) and fricatives (consonants where you’re blowing air out of your mouth, such as s and th)

	a	e	i	o	u	w	y
Long sound	f ather	f air	b ee	th aw	b e	y ou	tea
Short sound	f an	w ell	i t	cl oth	i t	g ood	a bout or t in Table 2: Welsh vowel sounds. Notice that u is pronounced as i. The short vowel y is usually, in the very short and common words like y and yn, pronounced like the ‘uhh’ at the start of about (this is called a schwa [ə]). It is also usually pronounced that way when it is not in the last syllable of a word, where in the last syllable it is pronounced more like the i in tin.

Diphthongs

Welsh, particularly North Walian, has 13 diphthongs. These are when two vowels come together within a single syllable. An English example is the word out, which is usually pronounced as /aʊt/ — if you say it slowly you can see that the two vowels glide into each other. A Welsh example is coed (/ko:ɨd/, meaning forest), where o and e come together to form a diphthong similar to the oi in the English coin. For better or worse, lots of these diphthongs sound similar (which makes it simpler) and some Welsh speakers (particularly South Walians) will simplify their diphthongs into single vowel noises. For a full list see the appendix, or look online for extra resources.

The best way to handle diphthongs is by knowing the individual vowel sounds and doing your best to glide between them. So, for the diphthong oi [o:ɨ], start making the o sound and glide smoothly to the i sound.
